RE: Muscle Manipulation

Dear Bill,

Thanks for listening to my story the other day, it's not often that I get to vent my frustration regarding my technique of muscle therapy.

Over the years I have developed a very successful technique, which works in one treatment and only takes a few minutes.

The issue is: Do muscles misalign or don't they?

The people I treat have usually seen numerous practitioners of various persuasions to no avail, had years of suffering, laid out thousands of dollars and are desperate for some answers and of course, relief.

I simply realign the muscles and free the nerves and they walk away fine! Then they ask me, "Why haven't all the others done this?" I have to reply that they don't know about it."

I have approached a number of researchers over the years, but can never get a hearing, let alone a chance to demonstrate my treatment's effectiveness. They usually say; "we are too busy" etc.

Professor Sally Ruston's letter, attacked, gave a good summary of the orthodox position.

It seems preposterous that someone who is unqualified and is using a method contrary to the orthodoxy could get such good results and yet the conventional methods fail every time.

So simply, do muscles misalign, or don't they? Does a pulley work when the rope is not in its groove or doesn't it? Wouldn't it be sensible to put the rope back where it belongs and then try to lift something?

I recently wrote to Dr. Norman Sevan in the hope that he might take an interest, but the first question his producer asked was "what are your qualifications?" I simply wanted to ask if he could refer me to Professor Ian Harris of the Orthopaedic Research Centre at the St. George Hospital as he had said on Normans program that back operations hardly ever work, that people are in chronic pain afterwards and on morphine for life and he would never recommend anyone to have one. I then wrote to Professor Harris and got no reply. From what I can work out, there are several reasons why they won't talk to me;

1. My lack of qualifications
2. The technique is not a recognised method i.e. there have been no possible papers in medical journals
3. It is contrary to the orthodox method

I learnt from people you would call "backyarders", you didn't get a diploma from them; they didn't run accredited colleges or charge thousands of dollars to learn. Most of them learnt on greyhounds and the methods were passed down throughout the families. It was very fortunate to get a chance to learn, so I grabbed it. I had fallen off a ladder and hurt my back, neck and shoulders no one could help me in Sydney. Someone told me about a muscle man in Maitland so I drove up and he fixed me in minutes then he offered to train me that was 1995 and I was unemployed and just placed on a disability pension with the label, borderline personality disorder! I took the opportunity and it had helped to rehabilitate me. I love dealing with the people and helping them and my mental health has improved enormously. Before I went into all this I was a naïve layman but all I can say now after treating about 20,000 people most of them successfully, that I am pretty disillusioned, angry and resentful that I get no recognition or thanks from the medics for fixing their patients. I have been called a charleton, a quack and generally completely ignored.

I am over 70 now, and should be happy with what I have achieved, but I can't just give up for the following reasons;

1. The public deserve better – they know they are being exploited. I have enormous support from my patients, which is very gratifying
2. All these health professional are a earning a very good living by not fixing people i.e. what they do is fraudulent
3. The cost to the taxpayer. The health budget continues to rise. What if physios used my technique? You would go to your doctor with a sore neck, shoulder, or back and he would do a simple test, refer you to the physio next, he/she would realign the muscles, charge a fee and prescribe a couple of simple exercises and everyone would be happy. The savings would be in the billions!
4. What's happening now is simply WRONG and anyway, Tony Abbot said recently "never,never,never give up!" – And I won't.

And of course there's workers comp. what good is it for all concerned that is!

One example:

A shearer came to me last year in Tassie; he had been on compo for 9 years, been through a court case, had settlement and pension off a disability. He had a bad lower back.

Thoroughly sick of himself, he decided to go back to work, even though it caused him excruciating pain. He heard about what I did for several other shearers and decided to come to me for treatment.

I was able to realign the buttock muscles and free the sciatic nerve, straight away he was fixed. He rang me up soon after and said he shorn about 600 sheep and had no pain anywhere! He has a treatment whenever he feels a twinge, I gave him a "tune up" and off he goes to shear more sheep.

I have said more than enough, but my letter to Norman Swan will give you a fuller picture.

Thanks again, Bill; I hope we can catch up again before long.

Best Regards
